

nally the viewer sees the face of a young girl as she sleeps with a smile on her face. Each frame has played a significant role in telling the viewer something about the action and the character preceding the scene about to be played.

The close-up can be extremely effective in capturing the major emotions. Often it is misused because it has not been employed with discretion. As one critic reports, the director must realize that "it is an elephant gun with which you do not hunt rabbits." Often directors use a close-up of the actor speaking rather than the actor to whom the speech is directed. As in the theater, the audience's sympathies and attention are often with the listener. A close-up of the listener can be very important.

Switching cameras and types of "shots" serves to punctuate emphatically the story by interrupting or terminating a scene. A series of quick switch shots creates the illusion of confusion, or they may heighten the swiftly moving action and the emotions involved in a scene. Often the episodic nature of the television play requires a careful selection and variety of techniques in handling cameras. At the same time the actor cannot remain immobile, and many of the basic rules of stage movement will be utilized by the video director. As one authority in the field of television production has said, "After six seconds something had better move—or the viewer will!"

To appreciate fully the function of the television director, one can help himself by studying television scripts. Fortunately several inexpensive anthologies of television plays are now available: Best Television Plays, edited by Gore Vidal, Ballantine, N. Y., 35¢; Paddy Chayefsky's Television Plays, Simon and Schuster, N. Y., $1.50. For a more detailed discussion of cameras and production techniques, the student should read Techniques of Television Production by Rudy Bretz (McGraw-Hill, 1953). And by all means critically view current television dramas and analyze them in terms of camera shots, transition methods, types of scenery, the sequence of scenes, the ratio of close-ups to "wide angle shots," and the other numerous units in the language of television which have been discussed in these articles.

Many specific techniques and rules have been outlined. Many more could be included, but basically the leit motif of the series has been the importance of creativity and imagination. Recently a business forecaster, evaluating the future of a major television network, had to admit that "creativity must not suffer" and "it is the nature of this vital media that creative minds will continue to work and try to make their contribution." Our responsibility is to remove the suggested pessimism indicated by the word "try." The future of the electronic theater rests with you—students today, leaders tomorrow.
